The important, and celebrating the Mother of Black History every February is a valuable time to open the doors to conversations and learning opportunities about the realms of blacks, the rich depth of black culture and the ways in which these realizations remain indelibly woven into the fabric of American history. While it is crucial not to relegate discussions about black history only to February, the holiday of a is a significant opportunity to recalibrate and refocus on the cultural and creative contributions that blacks have made over the course of American history and to trigger discussions about inclusions, diversity and our shared role in pursuing racial justice. It is also a time to appreciate artistic works by Black creators - works that illuminate collective pain but also those that highlight the beauty of what it means to be Black. Reading works on lists of anti-racist books and observing When They See Us are important tools for learning more about black experiences. But it is also essential to celebrate and give brilliance to black narratives - and not just when it comes to trauma. In a statement to BBC Ideas, author Irenosen Okojie reiterates that it is to celebrate film, art and Black literature because these works shape our perception of Black communities and people. "What happened for a long time and for a long time was black trauma, it was something that was at the forefront," Okojie said. "What this does in the long run, I think, is that creates a distorted sense of what is Black culture, so we don't see enough of Black realized and Black celebration."
